Strengthening Democracy

Recently, President Bush urged schools to make sure that our students understand that democracy is more than a historical legacy. The Center for Education in Law and Democracy and our co-sponsoring organizations recognize that social studies teachers fill a particularly important role in helping the next generation of Americans think about their role in changing society for the better and preserving precious freedoms.

Thus, the 18th annual one-day civic education conference is designed to help meet this challenge. Teachers—and the law-related resource people and community leaders who work with them—will receive content updates and relevant classroom materials regarding local, state, national, and international topics. Participants will leave the conference with new ideas for teaching about our democratic institutions and our role in the world, as well as insights into underlying assumptions about democracy and the role of social studies in preparing citizens.
